

HOME/HERE

Caught and constituted by deeply unequal movement, the mind-bodies of diasporic subjects become channels, passageways through which the colony haunts its metropole. Places are held in the body, move it and are moved through it; movement is a kind of stillness and stillness belies movement. In what ways do we cross the ocean? How do we inhabit rupture, disjunction, and diasporic superimposition? Home/Here is a transnational haunting, a home breaking through the here—but what is home, and where is here?
