ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

This compilation was accompanied with a network of support from advisors and colleagues. First, I would like to express the deepest gratitude to my doctoral advisor, Dr. Donald G. Buth for his guidance, patience, and insightful criticisms on this crocodilian-parasite database. His encouragement in starting this project has greatly benefited my future prospects in parasitology and crocodilian research. I am also grateful for Dr. Malcolm Gordon and Dr. Michael Alfaro for their guidance assisting me to establish a strong scientific research background that is intellectually worthy. I would also like to acknowledge Dr. Armand Kuris' continuous encouragement, enthusiasm, and mentorship throughout my academic career, and for introducing me to the wonderful world of parasites! Finally, I would like to extend my appreciation to Dr. Ruth Elsey and the Steering Committee of the Crocodile Specialist Group for help in obtaining information and their continual support and enthusiasm for crocodile-parasite endeavors.

This crocodilian-parasite checklist and synthesis is dedicated to my Tio Fernie and Tia Rosie whose support, inspiration and love throughout their years on earth gave me the motivation to accomplish this project. The inner strength and faith they instilled in me will continue to assist me in overcoming any hurdle or challenge the future may bring.

ABSTRACT

Records of parasitism in crocodilians date back to the early 1800s, distributed among published and unpublished manuscripts, and international parasite catalogs. It is possible that parasites of crocodilians are highly host specific, resulting in a relationship that began over 200 million years ago. Analyzing parasite-host specificity, geographic distribution, and taxonomy can provide otherwise cryptic details about crocodilian ecology and evolution, as well as their local food web dynamics. This information may also be useful to implement improved conservation tactics for both crocodilians and their habitat.

As climate change, anthropogenic conflict, and environmental pollution endanger crocodilian ecosystems, there is a need for organized information on crocodile, alligator, caiman, and gharial infectious diseases. This is the first checklist of crocodilians and their parasites. I trust this compilation will encourage further studies that incorporate ecology, parasitology, phylogeography, coevolution, and immunology to bring insight to crocodilian life-history, evolution, and conservation. Additionally, this information may encourage veterinarians, biologists, and ecologists to expand studies of other reptilian-parasite systems, and perhaps improve our understanding of human impacts on ecosystems.

INTRODUCTION

The order Crocodylia comprises of an archaic lineage of reptiles descended from an archosaurian ancestor that lived about 254 million years ago (Janke and Arnason, 1997). Behavioral, morphological and physiological adaptations such as parental care, a four-chambered heart, and osmoregulation capabilities are crocodilian characteristics that distinguish them from other reptilians (Shine, 1988; Mazzotti and Dunson, 1989; Franklin and Axelsson, 1994). The immediate and non-hesitant immune system of crocodilians, in comparison to other vertebrates, is an exceptional evolutionary adaptation in response to wounds from intra- and interspecific conflict in bacteria-laden environments (Merchant et al., 2003, 2004, 2005). This suite of adaptations may have contributed to their long term persistence in changing environments since the Triassic.

Extant crocodilians inhabit sub-tropical and tropical locations around the world. As keystone predators, crocodilians are a significant contributor to community structure in generally high biomass, and low turnover ecosystems. However, their greatly reduced abundance under human hunting pressure has extirpated them from many locations, restricted their geographic ranges, and diminished their ecosystem role (Platt and Thorbjarnarson, 2000; Huchzermeyer, 2003; Richards et al., 2004; van der Ploeg and van Weerd, 2008; Shirley et al., 2009). Ultimately this can impact the interaction between crocodilians and their parasites, resulting in two negative outcomes. First, anthropogenic interactions can decrease parasitic prevalence and abundance in a host population by external factors hindering parasitic transmission or killing free-living stages of the parasite (Bush et al., 2001). Although this may seem beneficial, parasites that are host-specific for crocodilians may have developed relationships with their hosts, that may have contributed over evolutionary time the ability to repel a broad spectrum of invasive pathogens. The alteration of the host-parasite dynamics may contribute to a reduced ability to adjust to anthropogenic disturbances, enhancing crocodilian susceptibility to common and foreign parasites (Combes, 2001; Schoeb et al., 2002). In contrast, ecosystem perturbations may enhance the prevalence and intensity of certain parasites within a host population (Lafferty, 1997; Lafferty and Kuris, 1999). Increased parasite burdens in concurrence with immunosuppression caused by chronic stress in rapidly changing environments may enable viral, bacterial and parasitic infections to proliferate and overwhelm normal defense mechanisms, ultimately increasing morbidity or mortality of the host (Lafferty, 1997; Lafferty and Kuris, 1999; Koprivnikar and Walker, 2011). This is of considerable concern as the decline or elimination of keystone predators, including their parasites, can alter trophic dynamics, potentially triggering the collapse of an ecosystem (Fortin et al., 2005; Hudson et al., 2006; Myers et al., 2007; Ripple and Beschta, 2007).

The purpose of this database is to provide information that can further knowledge on the crocodilian-parasite dynamic that may be useful for scientific research and conservation management. As an example of the utility of this database, knowledge of shared parasite species or genera may assist investigations on the phylogenetic relationships among the New World crocodilian clade (Densmore and White, 1991; Brochu, 2000; Ray and Densmore, 2003; White and Densmore, 2000). Molecular and fossil evidence indicate that Crocodylus originated in Africa, and that the New World crocodilians appeared in the western hemisphere in the Late Miocene or Pliocene (White and Densmore, 2000; Brochu, 2000, 2004; Velez-Juarbe et al., 2007). The direction of dispersal is in question because C. niloticus maybe phylogenetically closer to New World crocodilians than to other species in Africa (Gatsey and Amato, 1998; Meganathan et al., 2010). The phylogenetic analysis of parasites among these crocodilians may provide a new perspective on the phylogenetic relationships of Crocodylus. Thus, the ability to use host-parasite data may enhance studies of crocodilian phylogeny and biology. This may be beneficial for both conservation, and other aspects of parasitology and crocodilian research.

MATERIAL AND METHODS

BACKGROUND INFORMATION

Records of parasites in crocodilians date to the early 1800s. Sources of information on crocodilian parasites are widely scattered and often published in inaccessible journals. Previously published checklists of vertebrate or reptilian parasites have included crocodilians, however many did not include all crocodilian species, nor all crocodilian parasite species reported (York and Maplestone, 1926; Dubois, 1936b, 1938b; Schuurmans-Stekhoven, 1937; Hughes et al., 1941b,c, 1942; Skrjabin, 1951a,b,c, 1964; Yamaguti, 1954, 1958, 1971, 1975; Dubois, 1969; Lauckner, 1985; Baker, 1987; Thatcher, 1993; Huchzermeyer, 2003). For example, Lauckner (1985) in the Diseases of Marine Mammals edited by Kinne overlooked listing the parasites of Crocodylus porosus, the saltwater crocodile (Kuris 1989). Further, systematics of crocodilians and their parasites have been extensively revised (for example, Nasir, 1974; Brooks, 1980). This can be confusing for scientists, researchers, students, and herpetologists interested in crocodilian biology and parasitology. To assist investigations of ecological and veterinary significance, I provide here a annotated checklist of crocodilian parasites.

This checklist includes all crocodilian species and subspecies recognized by the International Union for Conservation of Nature (IUCN) and the Crocodile Specialist Group (CSG). The survey includes all parasites identified in the particular host from the earliest documented crocodilian parasite (Rudolphi, 1819) to the present. A few records could not be examined and were excluded. Additionally, some parasites have gone through many taxonomic changes, such as species in Cryptogonimidae (Digenea). I have updated the nomenclatures for both hosts and parasites.

This synthesis of crocodilian-parasite interactions has been created to establish a foundation for future work. This information may foster studies that will not only contribute to the conservation and stability of crocodilians and their habitats, but also to the preservation of local flora and fauna, as well as to support the livelihood of people who utilize crocodilians for economic or cultural purposes.

SOURCES OF DOCUMENTATION

In searching records of parasites in crocodiles, the following sources were consulted.

1. Crocodilian, parasite and veterinary books.
2. Previous vertebrate and reptilian checklists, as well as taxonomic revisions from previous studies. Checklists or revisions that did not provide new or vital information on a parasite were not cited.
3. Research throughout scientific databases such as Melvyl, Zoological Record, Biosis, Web of Science, Google Scholar, WorldCat, and Jstor. In each database, search words included “parasite and crocodile/alligator/caiman/gharial,” “parasite and ‘crocodilian species name’,” “crocodile/alligator/caiman/gharial and pathogens,” and “crocodile/alligator/caiman/gharial, host-parasite relationship.” Synonymies were added to the checklist.
4. Various parasite-host databases were also searched: H.W. Manter Laboratory Collection, The Natural History Museum of London, the United States National Parasite Collection database, and the Catálogo de la Colección Nacional de Helminitos by Lamouthe-Argumedo (1997), which includes parasitic vouchers deposited at the Universidad Nacional Autónoma de Mexico. Abbreviations used to on-line parasite databases: H.W. Manter Laboratory Collection, MLC; National History Museum of London, NHM; Biosystematics and the US National Parasite Collection, NPC; Catálogo de la Colección Nacional de Helminitos, CCNH.

5. Museum databases of particular countries (for example, the National Museum of the Philippines for Crocodylus mindorensis) were searched. All databases were examined by using the crocodilian species name (and its synonymy) to detect if the database contained parasite references from a particular host. All museums contacted that had crocodilian parasites listed in a publication were not separately cited as above museums (NHM) or databases (CCNH): Australia, University of Queensland Museum; Brazil, Oswaldo Cruz Institute; India, National Museum of Natural History, New Delhi; Mexico, Natual History Museum, Mexico City; Philippines, National Museum of the Philippines; South Africa, Ditsong Museum of Natural History; Thailand, Thailand National Science Museum, Pathum Thani; Chulalongkorn University Museum of Natural History, Bangkok; Veterinarical Anatomy Museum, Kasetsart University, Bangkok; Pathology Museum, Kasetsart University, BangkokKasetsart University's Zoological Museum, Bangkok; United States of America, Florida Museum of Natural History, South Florida Museum, Louisiana Museum of Natural History, South Carolina Natural History Museum, US Smithsonian Museum of Natural History.
6. Several wildlife departments and researchers studying particular crocodilian species or that may have had information on crocodilian parasitism were contacted for further unpublished information: Dr. Win Chaeychomsri, Department of Zoology, Faculty of Science, Kasetsart University, Thailand; Dr. Ruth Elsey, Louisiana Department of Wildlife and Fisheries, Louisiana, USA; Dr. Fritz Huchzermeyer, Johannesburg, South Africa; Dr. Valentine Lance, Graduate School of Public Health, San Diego State University, USA; Dr. Paolo Martelli, Ocean Park, Hong Kong; Dr. Javier Nevarez, School of Veterinary Medicine, Louisiana State University, USA; Dr. Kent Vliet, Department of Biology, University of Florida, USA; Rom Whitaker, Madras Crocodile Bank, India.
7. The steering committee of the Crocodile Specialist Group (CSG) provided further scientific contacts that may assist in crocodilian parasite research.

TAXONOMY OF HOSTS AND PARASITES

Taxonomy of parasites was updated using Gibson et al. (2002), Jones et al. (2005), Bray et al. (2008), Anderson et al. (2009), on-line journals, and various internet taxonomic sites to achieve the most recent taxonomy. To verify taxonomic order and author, I used various websites: HYPERLINK, <http://zoology.fns.uniba.sk/faeu/worksheets/hierarchy.pdf>; Uniprot-Taxonomy, <http://www.uniprot.org/taxonomy/>; Index to organisms names (ION), <http://organismnames.com/query.htm>; Taxonomicon, <http://www.taxonomy.nl/Taxonomicon/TaxonTree.aspx>.

USE OF THE DATABASE

The crocodilian-parasite database lists parasites under crocodilian hosts. Crocodilians are listed according to taxonomic status: family, species, subspecies. Parasites from a crocodilian species are listed by phylum, order, family, genus and species. Some parasites were only identified to the level of phylum or order and are listed as “Unknown” at the level of identification. Published and unpublished records of finding crocodilian parasites are documented by date of publication or discovery. An example of the database follows with explanations. The parasite-host database is similarly organized.

HOST SPECIFICITY

Crocodilians are large, long-lived apex predators. As top predators, they also may accumulate various trophically transmitted parasites by consuming a wide variety of prey hosts over a long period of time. These life-history traits enable them to acquire and accumulate various parasite species over many years. In general, crocodilians are parasitized by a diverse array of species (Table 1). Caiman crocodilus crocodilus has the greatest reported species richness of parasites (~49 species), followed by Crocodylus porosus (~36 species), C. niloticus (~36 species), and Alligator mississippiensis (~26 species) (Table 3). Both C. c. crocodilus and C. porosus are frequently studied species being farmed and managed, allowing some wild populations to remain stable (Harvey and Hill, 2003; CITES, 2010). In contrast, there are no documented parasites of Alligator sinensis, and Crocodylus mindorensis. This is most likely due to the lack of research on these species rather than their lack of parasitism.

Patterns of parasitism among crocodilian species include generalist and specialists. Generalists parasitized various crocodilian species, whereas host specialists infected a single host species. Overall, there are fewer generalist parasite species (~99) than there are host specific species (~103).

Although insufficient research surely explains some of the documented specialists, host specificity may be functionally attributed to the lack of sympatry among crocodilian species and populations (Brooks, 1979a,b; Brooks and O'Grady, 1989); Huchzermeyer, 2003). Many crocodilian species are isolated due to geographic or anthropogenic barriers (Huchzermeyer, 2003). Therefore only parasites with life cycle patterns that overcome obstacles posed by vicariant barriers, enable some parasites to infect multiple hosts over disjunct geographic ranges. Three factors may explain the evolution of generalist parasites in crocodilian species: host dispersal, similar life-history traits (including diets), and availability of broad range of intermediate hosts.

Hosts that disperse from one region to another may acquire generalist parasites. For example, Crocodylus porosus utilizes ocean currents for trans-oceanic dispersal, facilitating its establishment at many Indo-Pacific islands (Campbell et al., 2010). Its vagility enables it to contact a variety of parasitic species.

Similar life-history traits and diet among crocodilian species enables shared parasitism among crocodilian species, particularly when these species are sympatric. Crocodilians spend most their life associated with aquatic environments in tropical and sub-tropical regions. Their prey preference changes over their growth development, primarily being insectivores up to their second year in life (Webb et al., 1982; Delany and Abercrombie, 1986; Platt et al., 2006). As they grow, their diet broadens and include crustaceans, fish, and other small non-fish vertebrates. As they reach adulthood they incorporate larger prey (Magnusson, 1985; Delany and Abercrombie, 1986; Platt et al., 2006). This life history exposes crocodilian parasites to a wide variety of trophically transmitted parasites. In summary, host dispersal, similar life-history traits and diets, and a broad range of intermediate hosts likely contribute to different crocodilian species sharing the same parasites.

A geographic pattern emerged when evaluating the association of generalist parasites by geographic regions. Three geographic regions can be inferred: the Americas, Africa, and Indo-Australia. Most generalist parasites shared amongst crocodilians within these regions were ascarid nematodes. For example, Dujardinascaris waltoni infecting crocodiles and caimans of the Americas, Dujardinascaris harrisae parasitizing C. porosus and C. novaguineae in Indo-Australia, and Ortleppascaris nigra found in African crocodiles. Additionally, generalist parasitism was associated with living sympatry. Crocodylus porosus and C. johnsoni, the only species found in Australia, are both parasitized by Leiperia australiensis and Typhlophorus spratti. In addition, the acanthocephalan Polyacanthorhynchus rhopalorhynchus, infects the intestines of all six caiman species in Brazil being both geographically specific and subfamily specific.

There are some perplexing geographic records for a few generalist parasites. The nematode, Terranova lanceolata, is present in American and Australian crocodilians, and Trispiculascaris trispiculascaris has been documented from Crocodylus niloticus of Africa and Caiman crocodilus fuscus of the Americas. The great barriers separating the host species suggests that these apparent generalists may simply reflect insufficient research distinguishing related parasites.

CONCLUSIONS

This crocodilian-parasite database provides a foundation for future research on crocodilian parasitism. Data extrapolated from this study can be utilized to investigate the role of crocodilian parasites in food webs, and ecosystems, and how stressors may alter host-parasite dynamics. Studies have linked predator reduction to reduced presence of trophically transmitted parasites, and concomitant increase in other types of parasites of abundant hosts at lower trophic levels (Lafferty and Kuris, 1999; Bush et al., 2001; Lafferty et al., 2008). Moreover, the fundamental dependence of parasites on both host and environment supports the use of parasites as biological indicators of environmental conditions. Quantifying parasites of keystone predators, such as crocodilians, may assist analyses of ecosystem function. In a rapidly changing environment, knowledge of the significance of crocodiles and their parasites may improve their conservation and facilitate responsible stewardship of these important predators.

 Parasites under Hirudinea, Diptera and Ixodes are considered generalist parasites in this table.

 Unidentified parasites to species are not considered in this table.

 Rare or accidental parasites are not considered in this table.

APPENDIXTable 3. List of generalist and host specific parasites

Parasites found only once in a host and lacking reports of that parasite in other crocodilian hosts but are found in other vertebrates are not considered in this list (i.e., accidental/rare parasites), nor are parasites identified to genus.

Explanation of numbered parasitic groups and genera

1. Although there are various paratenic parasites and vectors under these phyla, it is probable that the choice of host was not specific to the crocodilian species in question.

Table 3. List of generalist and host specific parasites

2. Parasite genera is unique to crocodilian hosts, thus can be considered crocodilian host-specific.
3. Parasite is described only once but only found in crocodilian hosts thus is considered to be a crocodilian specific parasite.

Addendum

Since the final edit was accepted, another report of crocodile parasitism has been published, as well as a study of the genetic divergence of Osteolaemus in different regions in Africa.

A nematode parasite was discovered in the Nile crocodile (La Grange et al., 2013). Its placement is described under the crocodile-parasite section below, omitting the already documented data within the monograph. The reference is included after the description.

Second, Franke et al. (2012) discovered that there are four distinct allopatric lineages of the African Dwarf Crocodile, Osteolaemus tetraspis, living in Africa, which included a Congo basin form (O. osborni), a West African form (O. tetraspis), an Ogooué Basin form (O. sp. nov.) and a new species that was closely related to O. osborni. Locality data for hosts is necessary for the correct assignment of parasites to species in this expanded genus.
