

Contributors

Special thanks to our contributors for their dedication and hard work.

L. M. MARTINS graduated from Bucknell University in May 2021 double majoring in neuroscience and classics. They are interested in gender dynamics in ancient mythology and exploring the stories of women in antiquity through creative writing pieces. They would like to thank Professor Stephanie Larson for allowing them to take her “Women in Antiquity” seminar and for always pushing them to take risks. Martins will be joining the University of California, Berkeley as a PhD student in integrative biology.

KARL ULAS-ONO graduated from King’s College London in December 2020 with a bachelor’s degree in classical studies. His main research interests are in moral philosophy and the reception of the classical world from the eighteenth century to the present. He records his sincere gratitude to the BUJC team for their support throughout the editing process, and to Dr. Avlamis for introducing him to Achilles Tatius at King’s.

ETHAN RITE graduated from Tulane University in December 2020 with a bachelor’s degree in linguistics and classical studies. His interests include the historical linguistics of ancient Greek and Ch’orti’ Mayan, the Histories of Herodotus, and interaction between Greek and the Anatolian languages. He extends thanks to Professor Ryan Boehm for encouraging the development of this paper, the Tulane Department of Classical Studies for education in Greek and Latin, and Professor Marc Zender for training in Mayan languages and historical linguistics.

WILL SHAO graduated from Stanford University in June 2021 with a bachelor’s degree in classics and minors in modern languages and international relations. His research interests currently include the reception of classics in the twentieth and twenty-first centuries, particularly with regards to dramatic works. Will would like to thank Professor McCall for his guidance throughout the research and writing process, as well as the Stanford Classics department for supporting his studies over the past four years.

SOJEET SHARMA is a junior at Cornell University double majoring in biological sciences and classics and minoring in Sanskrit studies. While pre-Hellenistic Greek culture is of great interest to Sojeet, what interests him the most is actually the pre-Greek Cycladic and Minoan peoples, the latter of which are most known for being the first European civilization. He would like to thank immensely Professor Courtney Roby for her help in his pursuit of Greek, and his parents for their unwavering support.

ARJUN SRIRANGARAJAN graduated from the University of Southern California in May 2021 with a bachelor’s degree in classics and minors in linguistics and economics. He intends to continue his studies with a master’s degree in linguistics, philology, and phonetics at the University of Oxford. His research interests include Indo-European linguistics and literature, comparative myth, and the ancient Near East. He would like to thank his professors, especially Professor Zuckerman, for their help in making this paper possible.